WASHINGTON.

Debate on the Suffrage Question in Both Houses of Congress.

Passage of the Senate Bill for the Reduction of the Army.

Authority of the Senate to Authorize the Sale of Public Lands by Treaty.

The Joy Purchase of Cherokee Neutral Lands Declared Null and Void.

Statement Concerning the Fraudulent Drawback Claims.

Special Despatch to The Chicago Tribune.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 29.

Mr. Loughlin, a commissioner of the settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands, has received the following legal opinion from General Butler, Judge Lawrence and Judge William Johnston, of Ohio, and from Mr. Julian, Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in regard to the rights of the Senate to authorize the sale of public lands by treaty:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 28, 1869.

SIR: In answer to your inquiries in relation to the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas, we give our opinions as follows: Under the act of Congress of May 30, 1860, and the treaty of the 19th of February, 1861, the Cherokee tribe of Indians acquired the right to occupy the Cherokee neutral lands without any power of alienation, and on condition that the lands should revert to the United States if they should be abandoned by the tribe. The tribe has, as such, abandoned the lands by treaty proclaimed August 11th, 1866, and June 24th, 1867, between the United States and Cherokees, and from Mr. Julian, Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in regard to the rights of the Senate to authorize the sale of public lands by treaty:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 28, 1869.

SIR: In answer to your inquiries in relation to the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas, we give our opinions as follows: Under the act of Congress of May 30, 1860, and the treaty of the 19th of February, 1861, the Cherokee tribe of Indians acquired the right to occupy the Cherokee neutral lands without any power of alienation, and on condition that the lands should revert to the United States if they should be abandoned by the tribe. The tribe has, as such, abandoned the lands by treaty proclaimed August 11th, 1866, and June 24th, 1867, between the United States and Cherokees, and from the Secretary of the Interior purports to be authorized to sell the lands. The question is whether the sale has been made to James F. Joy. The Secretary of the Interior was not authorized by the treaty of 1866 to make a sale, and the Cherokee Nation having no power to alienate these lands to foreign governments or foreign citizens, the consent with and sale to it are void, unless the public lands of the United States in Indian occupancy can constitutionally be sold by virtue of treaties with Indian tribes, and without an act of Congress. We have no hesitation in saying that such power exists in the United States, and that the treaty-making power can constitutionally sell Indian lands without the consent of Congress, unless the Constitution requires such consent in express terms or by implication. We have carefully examined this question, and the opinion is pretty sure to lead to a good deal of litigation.

THE INAUGURATION BALL.

A Congressional and other Republican Committee on the Inauguration Ball had a long meeting this afternoon and finally agreed to engage for the use of the rotunda of the Capitol in the evening of Inauguration day for a ball free to ticket holders, persons furnished with tickets of invitation to be excluded. The ball will be granted. Several old citizens of Washington have volunteered to get up a ball for the evening, and have half got the promise of Secretary McCulloch that they may use the large hall of the Treasury building for that purpose. The two committees appointed at this meeting is apparently only begun.

THE JUDICIARY.

In Senate Judiciary Committee, at its meeting this morning, agreed to a bill which will add another Justice to the Supreme Bench, make Justice a quorum, authorize the appointment of Circuit Judges to each of the nine existing Judicial Circuits, who shall be Justices of the Supreme Court sitting in the Circuit Courts, and shall have all the jurisdiction therein as the Justice of the Supreme Court allotted to that circuit, and fixing their salaries the same as the Justices of the Supreme Court. The bill was drawn up by Judge Justice, and has the approval of the Chief Justice.

CONGRESS' DEFENCE.

Under Counsel are continued in the defence of himself against the supposed imputation of treason that his issue to the Commissioner of the Land Office appointed by the Secretary of the Interior in the interest of a California mining claim. In grew very warm in his speech as he closed, and was frequently interrupted by applause which he said later, and after a pause added: "That's it, sir." Mr. Fenton then moved an adjournment, and through a vote of the honest sentence of the day in the Senate Chamber, by its close it was quite crowded, and on put to a vote, and that only a very sensitive nature was disposed it. He closed by saying that he would not submit a letter of such a character considered a mere reference to it as though it was better for Mr. Conness to settle it.

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28.—The Secretary of War has appointed Hon. William H. Kemble, of Jersey, Commissioner of Pennsylvania, and Robert Dale Owen, of Indiana Commissioners appointed to examine the claims of Indiana for moneys expended by the State in enrolling, equipping and subsisting troops called out to aid in suppressing the rebellion, meet at Indianapolis on the 1st of February, and continue in session ten days.

The Board of Officers of the Regular Army convened in this city to-day, to the amount of the Union and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies, met to-day and elected Hon. Collis P. Huntington President, and Hon. Leland Stanford Vice President for the ensuing year. Mr. Huntington is now in New York, and Mr. Stanford in San Francisco.

THE CHEROKEE NEUTRAL LANDS.

The Senate had a long session this morning on the Cherokee neutral lands bill, which was finally passed, and will go to the House substantially as reported from the Committee on Public Lands. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized to sell the lands to actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to each settler, at not less than $1.25 per acre, and to issue patents therefor, and that the proceeds of the sales shall be paid to the Cherokee Nation, after deducting the expenses of the survey, sale, etc. Mr. Pomeroy moved to amend the bill by providing that the lands should be sold to actual settlers only, and that no person should purchase more than 160 acres. Mr. Pomeroy said that the object of the amendment was to prevent speculators from buying up the lands. Mr. Howard opposed the amendment, and Mr. Pomeroy withdrew it. Mr. Howard moved to amend the bill by providing that the lands should be sold to actual settlers only, and that no person should purchase more than 160 acres. Mr. Howard

THE RAILWAY FARE BILL.

The State Senate, yesterday, concurred in the [illegible] amendments to the railway Fare Bill, which now goes to the Governor for consideration. We have strong impressions that, if the bill is passed and becomes a law, the Legislature will be called together in a hurry to repeal it, before the first day of June next, that being the semi-annual dividend day of the Michigan Central Railroad. Whether a repeal of the law will have the effect to save the State from the consequences of its enactment can only be determined by the courts. In the event the company is released from the payment of its seven per cent toll the State, some advantage will accrue to the counties on the line of the road, they will undoubtedly get their transportation cheaper. The company, being no longer required to pay half a million dollars per year into the State treasury, can reduce their rates of freight and fare to the people on the line of the road very considerably, and will do it if they are wise—in which event it will be more or less difficult to get the seven per cent toll restored than it was get it imposed in the first place. This seven per cent is really paid by the shippers and travellers on the road. They do not exhibit any receipts analogous to those that tax again, after it is once fairly off their shoulders.

Governor Palmer is committed to sign a bill restricting railway charges, but he is not committed to sign one putting a penalty the claim of the State to seven per cent of the gross receipts of the Illinois Central Railway. This is still an open question to him and we hope he will take time to consider it. It is not a match to say that any person who is concerned, directly or indirectly, in urging about that result, will have reached the vanishing point of his political career. All the law that has been produced on this point in the debate in the Legislature is worth preserving, and action made to procure the opinion of the Attorney General upon it was directed down. In short, there has been a recklessness displayed in this behalf, entirely unbecoming, to say the least.

THE GEORGIA QUESTION.

The report of the Committee on Judiciary in the matter of the credentials of Joshua Hill, Senator from Georgia, adverse to his claims to a seat, takes the ground that Georgia is not entitled to representation in Congress, notwithstanding she has been "admitted into the Union" by the action of Congress, and her Representatives in the other end of the Capitol have been sworn in, and are now voting upon all measures pending before the House. That we have the honor to be assorted to us of a State ll way in the Union and half ay out of it. It is admitted in Senator ewart's report (which is the most nervous document we remember to have seen), that a law was passed on the 4th of June, 1868, "to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama and Florida to representation in Congress." It is admitted that Mr. Hill was elected by the Legislature of Georgia, and that he is qualified in every respect to take a seat in the Senate. But it is claimed that the Representatives out of one hundred and seventy-five, and four Senators out of forty-four, in the Legislature, were "ineligible to seats that body. No evidence was lered to the Judiciary Committee prove that these persons were ineligible. No witness was examined, and nothing was adduced in this behalf except the files of a newspaper (the Atlanta ve), containing a report of the investigation made by the Georgia Legislature, which, so far as it is authoritative, disproves Senator Stewart's conclusions. If the expulsion of the colored members of the Georgia Legislature, some time subsequent to the election of Mr. Hill as nator, is alluded to, not as having any earing upon his claim to a seat, but as showing that no substantial injustice is done to the people of Georgia by excluding him—that is, "it's all in the family."

It seems to us that no comment on such document is necessary. Any person who reads the report and the law will agree with us that Mr. Hill cannot prove less useful member of the Senate than he Hon. Mr. Stewart, of Nevada. Senators Conkling and Frelinghuysen, while objecting in the strongest terms to Mr. Hill as not now admitted to a seat in the Senate, declined to sign their names to the report, which is, therefore, not the report of a majority of the committee.

PAYING OTHER PEOPLE'S POSTAGE.

We asked the Hon. T. W. Ferry, of Michigan, to assign a good reason for his motion to make the people at large pay the postage on letters sent by those who write to Congressmen. Mr. Ferry answers:

> I am in favor of abolishing the franking privilege altogether, but so long as it exists, and for the purpose of fairly testing the sincerity of its abolition, I am in favor of abolishing the franking privilege, so far as it relates to the members of Congress from the payment of postage upon their correspondence with constituents, and requiring the same constituency to prepay upon their mail matter to their representatives. The relation is an official one. Inverting much correspondence now sent free between the most valuable matter in the shape of documents and letter upon personal matters, which the franking privilege exists just to bear equally upon people and representative. The relation is official.

We take issue with these arguments. There is no reciprocity in the matter. A member of Congress is a public agent, attending to the business of his constituents—the public—for which service he is paid, or takes a salary, mileage and various perquisites. He has many letters to write to his constituents on their business, and public documents to send them for their information and use. It would be unreasonable to ask him to pay the postage on these letters and documents out of his own pocket, as the postage is a part of his salary, and besides this, the mail matter is on other people's business and not on that of a member in his capacity as a citizen. It is, therefore, right and proper that the cost of carriage should be either out of the Treasury or by the persons to whom the letters and documents were sent; but the objection to the latter course is that not one in five would pay the postage on most of the documents and speeches scattered over the country by the honorable gentlemen.

But the case is altogether different with regard to sending letters to members of Congress. The writers are not representatives, but constituents. They correspond about their own business and interests, and each one should pay his own postage, instead of having it taxed upon his neighbors who do not write. One man will remit a hundred letters and five hundred circulars to Congressmen when chasing after an office, a contract, a job, a patent extension, or other personal favor. Why should he not pay his own postage, and what right has his Representative in charge other people with the cost of the office-lder's or speculator's correspondence? Pete[illegible] to members of State Legislatures and State and county officers pay their own postage, and people writing to Revenue officers and agents in Washington do likewise; and why should not the same rule apply to communications sent to Congressmen? Why should not the rule be uniform? Besides, the government will be called to assume the payment of the principal sum of money and the contingent fund to pay for stationery and postage. But they have no right to vote money out of the Public Treasury to pay the postage of this or any other person.

It is a question of principle, and not of amount. If the bill is passed and becomes a law, the Legislature will be called together in a hurry to repeal it, before the first day of June next, that being the semi-annual dividend day of the Michigan Central Railroad. Whether a repeal of the law will have the effect to save the State from the consequences of its enactment can only be determined by the courts. In the event the company is released from the payment of its seven per cent toll the State, some advantage will accrue to the counties on the line of the road, they will undoubtedly get their transportation cheaper. The company, being no longer required to pay half a million dollars per year into the State treasury, can reduce their rates of freight and fare to the people on the line of the road very considerably, and will do it if they are wise—in which event it will be more or less difficult to get the seven per cent toll restored than it was get it imposed in the first place. This seven per cent is really paid by the shippers and travellers on the road. They do not exhibit any receipts analogous to those that tax again, after it is once fairly off their shoulders.

Governor Palmer is committed to sign a bill restricting railway charges, but he is not committed to sign one putting a penalty the claim of the State to seven per cent of the gross receipts of the Illinois Central Railway. LITTLE GOLDIE'S

STORY OF WOMAN'S LOVE.

BY MRS. SUMNER HAYDEN.

(HATTIE HAYDEN)

Author of "Rose from the Bridal," "A Drop of Crimson," &c., &c.

CHAPTER I.

One of the most beautiful places in the State of New York may be found a few miles south of the mouth of the Hudson River, and having a delightful view of that beautiful estuary, which, at this point, is about nine miles wide.

Upon a green, sloping hillside, a white house, with long rows of green blinds, some standing open and some closed, peeps out from a dense mass of grand old trees—elm, chestnut, locust, beech and linden, the latter in full bloom and sending forth its perfume to the passer-by, and making the air heavy with sweetness.

A garden of bright-colored flowers extends from the two-storied porch in front of the house to the gravel walk, and between the hedge and the road a smooth, green bank of grass invites the passer-by to rest, for the cottage stands within a few feet of the road.

Stout fields, cultivated to their fullest degree, lie all around, and a wide belt of woodland bounds the farm on two sides, extending back upon the hill. Back of the low farm-house are the orchards, now in the spring time white with apple blossoms, and pink with the bloom of the peach trees.

In the wide, white-floored kitchen a pleasant-faced matron is seeing the "tops" of several loaves of brown bread, preparatory to putting them in the brick oven, while a tempting pie is cooling and cracking.

This is Mrs. Mellen, and her three daughters are in the room with her.

There is a handsome, blooming young lass as one could select from among a thousand.

Annabel, Annabel, called "Belle," was simply a bow of delight for the future corn pudding, which stood in the earthen pot, waiting beside the brown bread for the fire to be taken from the oven.

May, the second daughter, was filling the pumpkin pies, one in the mouth of the oven," as Mrs. Mellen had said. She was humming a low, sweet snatch of song, and ever and anon, as she bent over the window, through the blossoms of the pear trees, along the farm-house road.

Goldie, the youngest and pet of the whole family, was sitting in a low rocking-chair, pouting her cherry lips, pulling the leaves from a sprays of apple blossoms which she held in her hand, and singing in a voice as sweet and clear as a bird's, and daintily white Marseilles apron, so prettily bound with braid, and ruffled at the edge.

Her sleeves were rolled up to the elbow, and her arms that in the child, and lovely as the rest of the other. She entered the kitchen this morning, with his blue check frock and his wide-brimmed hat, proclaiming him the farmer that he was.

"What is the matter, pet? Who has been plaguing Goldie?" he asked, stopping to pat her showering, curling, golden hair.

"Matter enough, I should think!" she exclaimed, pulling vigorously at the leaves of the branch from the apple-tree, now that the blossoms were all destroyed.

"What have they said to my Goldie?"

"Why Belle and May! They have coaxed me to say I can't go over to the old house with the party who are going for a ride this afternoon! Belle is afraid there'll be somebody there with the shine of her! The great vain thing!" continued the irritated Goldie, in answer to her father's question.

"And the reason Goldie can't go, mother?" he asked.

"I have told she could not go. I merely told her it would be better for her to stay at home, as the other girls were both going. I shall need somebody here to help me about getting the tea ready. I have to help me while I'm coming to-night" answered the farmer's wife, a glorious smile of motherly love lighting up her face.

"Ki, ki, Goldie's going to stay at home! coming home from college, but he'll stop at the old house when the young folks are going to have candy pulling and a dance in the barn! Oh, no! I won't put him in the least bit in the way, for it will be next week, of course he'll stop at the old house!" continued the farmer.

"Of course he will!" blazed Goldie; "and it is because Frank Whitney and Ned Cameron are coming with him. Glad Belle and May are determined to keep me at home! I'll fix 'em, your precious ladies; see if I don't!"

"Hush! hush! you are getting excited, pet," remonstrated the father.

"Goldie's blue eyes flashed triumphantly; she knew her father's will to be law in that house.

CHAPTER II.

Farmer Mellen owned, in addition to the homestead, an old place that had come down a large farm. The old house had fallen into disrepute, being called "haunted" by the credulous, and having refused to having seek lights shining through the windows at midnight, although the house had not been inhabited for years. Others declared that strange noises proceeding from its gloomy old walls—sometimes like the voices in mortal agony, and sometimes blows and the sound of supplication. It had even been said that a woman's voice had been heard upon this night which, sometimes striking and again in low moans.

Therefore, no person cared to live there, and Mr. Mellen had purchased the place for half its real value.

Words grow with rank grass in the once fine garden, and the flowers had been trampled down by the cattle that now fed upon the grass up to the very doors, where young voices had long ago made merry and cracking.

This old house was covered inside with dust and cobwebs, but the jolly party, with Belle and Frank at their head, were going with full glee of holding a frolic in its empty rooms.

Goldie, who had been chora, and swept the lower floors and dusted the old beams and corner-posts with wreathes of green from the huge beam extending across the middle of every room, and with bouquets of early flowers had been suspended.

The reckless young pleasure-seekers enjoyed the dancing until nearly midnight, when some of the young ladies proposed starting.

We should have been treated to a glimpse of the ghost, girls," cried Christopher as a signal for the young ladies to scream, and cling to their partners.

"Let us give three cheers for the ghost!" cried one reckless youth.

Others responded, and a deafening cheer went up on the night.

Was it the echo of gay voices that caused the heavy rumbling sound in the rooms over these in which they stood?

The wood during were silent now, for a shaking, roaring noise, followed by a sound like the rolling of boxes in a cradle, fell upon their ears.

A terrific scene ensued—a whizzing noise to the ears of the terrified creatures, and a horrible object came slowly in sight. It was something like a man's head in shape, with open mouth, from which issued a yellow tongue of fire, and a blackish flame streamed forth. Two rows of even, ox-like teeth gleamed ghastly in the sulphurous smoke that enveloped them.

The air was filled with a unutterable smell, and the terrible object disappeared as the children, in a body, rushed down the stairs.

"I tried to tell you it was a ghost!" exclaimed Belle Mellen, pale and frightened, yet indignant at the ridicule showered upon her.

"Yes! how convenient for ghosts, now it remembers to appear when we are all together!" said Christopher Mellen, for nearly a year, and was only waiting for him to choose a profession, and become settled to it, to become his wife.

She was a coquette, with wild manners, and accepted the offered arm, and they led the way to the supper table.

Belle Mellen and Frank Whitney followed, May and Ned Cameron coming next, and the others in order.

For the first time in many years the old house echoed to the joyful voices of youth, and merry laughter rang through the rooms, waking the echoes in the empty rooms above.

"I wonder how long it has been since a gay party assembled here last?" cried May Mellen, after listening to the fun in silence, for a few moments.

"Not since Noah left a few of his ark-born associates here!" answered Christopher, gaily.

A peal of laughter followed this rude speech.

Is it no subject for a jest, Christy? Only think of it! Sometime there must have been human beings as gay as we should think to see such an old, once marked and sang, loved and hated, within these dismal walls!

Perhaps the people of a century ago held a merry assembly here, more boisterous than ours."

"If they could have seen us they would rise up then and there, we ought to give them three cheers!"

Christy, determined not to allow any one to monopolize while he lived, he jested.

The young man who had been sent to the House of Correction for theft, and now returned, and the scene were brilliantly illuminated. The only sound across from the rustic beach and re-ired to the dancing-room, when the dancing of ends commenced

Literators, science and art were lounging with equal ease. The refreshments on women's rights and woman suffrage. The ladies were lounging with equal ease. The refreshments and supplies were long remembered by Mrs. Leonard, in active part of everything. She played in admirable style by Mrs. Jackson, who is the wife of Hon. Thomas Drummond. The music was furnished by those who heard it. The public will be happy to hear that Mrs. Leonard will be held next month. At 11 o'clock refreshments were served in the dining-room, and shortly afterward, each one wishing that when next there is a meeting, they will be favored by the same. The event was a success, and, compared to be repeated. The Board of Public Works of said city, in pursuance to the order and streets of said city, in pursuance to the order and streets of said city, in pursuance to the order and streets
